system, which he has put into books, DVDs and seminars. But he says part of it focuses on an athlete learning to bring balance to the conscious mind, the subconscious mind and the self image, with no factor being larger or smaller than the others. The program also teaches competitors to focus on the process in competition instead of results.

"I choked," Bassham said of the 1972 Olympics. "I caved under the pressure, so I started to collect data from Olympians. What they were telling me was a lot different than what I thought. I was trying as hard as I could on every shot to get it in the 10 ring. I was very outcome oriented, and the Olympic champions were telling me not to be outcome oriented, not to try to win. They said you should try to execute. The process is more important than the outcome."
